Touch beyond language

What I'm mainly discussing is the importance of touch to your memory and how long do you have an impression of someone who has passed away? Touch is different from sight and hearing. Touch is close, personal and intimate. It can also feel itself and has a unique meaning in the world. Just like each person's skin belongs to each person's unique imprint, it is also an important way of connecting with the world. Language is something that stays in memory. According to the changes of time, the development of science and technology in the world, and the continuous progress of language, based on changes in history, experience, and facts, it is not simply a word system that points to A-Z, it's the world's response. Language can generate empathy through language, emotion, sound, speech and rhythm, etc. Like writing something written, poetry writing can give you some answers. Each poem has a unique linguistic vision. The deeper the memory and the unique touch, the slower the speed of forgetting in the heart. The real death is that everyone forgets you, but as long as it is in the heart, it is not forgotten.
